MRS. WEATHERHOLT DESIGNER OF DRESS WHICH WON PRIZE
"It always does me a lot of good to have some creation out of my shop go away ahead of me," said Mrs. Weatherholt, who conducts Mrs. Weatherholt's Style Shop at 230 North Second avenue, in speaking of the gingham dress contest held at Riverside park Friday evening.
"It was this way. When the announcement came out that a prize would be given for the prettiest gingham dress on the floor, I decided one of my creations was going to win that prize. I told Mrs. R. P. Brogan, when she went to the dance in that dress, that she would win the prize and she did too. We were all tickled nearly to death and pleased immensely that one of our dresses should be so far ahead of the others."
"It was merely a little gingham affair which I designed and made myself. Of course we are turning out others like it every day and we are certainly proud of them. Gingham is becoming more popular all the time and I believe that the modish designs which we have been making will become more popular all the time."
In addition to making dresses, Mrs. Weatherholt's Shop occasionally turns out silk shirts for men, and all sorts of dainty things for women.—Adv.

Proper Bread Making Requires 550 degrees Small Ovens Inadequate

The art of bread baking progresses with the years. What doesn't go forward goes backward. Fortunately, bread baking has gone forward.

Take the problem of heat, for example. Just a few years ago it had not been accurately determined just what degree of heat is correct to kill the bacteria in the dough mass and to properly fuse together the food elements of the loaf in the most assimilable form. Years of research and study fixed the proper heat at 550 degrees. This led to the scientific construction of giant ovens with regulators to insure the maintenance of this temperature of 550 degrees.

Thus there was established the fact that the food value of bread depends in large measure on the baker's knowledge of oven temperature and the use of a modern, scientifically constructed oven.

Much bread sold today is made in ovens that are faulty in construction, and which are built for show purposes. The bread baked in such ovens is sold hot. It tickles the palate if eaten fresh, but injures the stomach and robs the system of the tissue-building elements which bread made as THE PERFECTLY BALANCED RATION should contain.

Bread is your best food. Eat more of it.

"HIRAM JOHNSON," DECEASED
Such are the uncertainties on this sphere of woe.—Today we are, tomorrow where are we? Oh Hiram! Hiram! thou wast a most lovable and beautiful being; rotund in form, supple in action, musical of voice, and so light of foot, really I deplore thy demise more profoundly than I would were it thy namesake, to whom thy resemblance, particularly in the bulging cheek, narrow forehead, and snaky-like eye, is surely one of the wonders of the age.—Hiram! I oft cautioned thee of canines, to whom you now owe your untimely end.—In the mellow twilight of departing day as "Hi" and I were cogitating in our minds as to the possibilities of our oratorical soap box piece of mortality, blinding the weak-minded when spouting furiously and meaning nothing, (Hiram Johnson) both were aroused from reverie by the appearance of a strolling vendor of the Hearst manuscript of "truth, virtue and purity, the Examiner" (?) these "three graces" are significant, although there are others unprintable which should be substituted.—In companionship with this miscreant, was a large mongrel whose pedigree I dare not opine to trace, but none could deny the Hearst expression, and the Johnson "drooped optic," which superceded all other marks of canine degradation.—Hiram, who when angered, or frightened, gave me notice by side-stepping, cheek swelling, hair raising, and caterwaul incantation, speedily arising as this abomination called "terrier," advanced, and ere I could gather my senses the two were in rapid motion, Hiram for tree shelter, and the dog in rapacious greed to devour his carcass.—A sweet sigh of relief overcame me as these orbs recognized, far above the danger line, the pride of mine eye with four legs spread, and claws deeply imbedded, looking over his shoulder at the foe beneath who circled the tree in uproarious manifestation, his voice giving utterance to musical tremor, resembling an amateur baritone.—There are life imbued subjects who have no knowledge of a condition which warrants, "letting well enough alone." This applies to H. Johnson, on two legs, and H. Johnson on four legs.—The first has reached his limit, the second soon will, for instead of remaining in security, fast to his haven of relief, he, with one furious bound released all pinions, and trusting to his agile endowments leaped to the ground, galloping as a deer, toward his kennel.

It was but a short space, yet that dread foe whose bristling teeth portended destruction, was too swift of foot, and in the twinkling of an eye all that remained of mortal Hiram was a few scattered, "immortal fragments." I have preserved THE HEAD of that deceased feline, which shall be mounted and framed, cherished, and in guided letters his name shall adorn my "Sanctum Sanctorum," to perpetuate two memories, one of a faithful cat, and one of a contemptuous namesake: The cat I superstitiously believe was exterminated for having been christened with THAT NAME.—It should have been "Randolph Hearst" and yet being "horse and horse," it probably is immaterial.
